INTOLERANCE AT BACON'S CONVENTION.

The San Francisco Argonaut comments editorially on the prescriptive spirit manifested recently at Chicago as follows: "A curious instance of perfectly sincere intolerance was offered in the recent meeting of the Interstate Commerce Law Convention. This body called itself together for the purpose of discussing President Roosevelt's contemplated regulation of railway rates. The way the convention was called is a little nebulous but none the less the fact remains that it was apparently called for the purpose of discussion. There was nearly a thousand delegates, but when the convention came together it developed that they did not all think exactly alike. But a certain portion of the convention at once assumed that they were the 'straight goods,' and that the other fellows were the bolters. But the other fellows declined to accept this role and stated that they were 'it' and that the other fellows were the rebels. As a result the convention broke in two in the middle, and two conventions were held. One resolved that anything President Roosevelt might do concerning railway rates was all right. The other resolved that the regulation of railway rates was a very complex subject and deserved to be handled with great care. Both conventions then adjourned after a great deal of mutual abuse. "The curious fact of which we spoke is the indisposition of the Roosevelt wing even to listen to the speeches of the other factions. When the other factions clamored for free speech the Roosevelt faction serenely replied that they believed in free speech, too, if it was the right kind. We seem in this country to be rapidly drifting toward the condition existing in the Continental countries of Europe, where there is absolute intolerance for differences in political belief; in those uncomfortable countries the party in power is made up entirely of patriots and the opposition is made up entirely of traitors. This is an unfortunate symptom in American political life.
